A person's toes tell all

By Scott Craven
Arizona Republic

If you really want to get to know someone, have her shuck her shoes to bare her soul.

That's because the toes tell all, from leadership potential to how you handle anger. Even corns say something other than your tendency to wear uncomfortable footwear.

So says Marie Bernat, a full-time spa therapist and part-time toe reader. Bernat, who manages the spa at CopperWynd resort in Paradise Valley, Ariz., reads toes instead of palms when she wants to know someone.

"One man told me after I read his toes that I knew more about him in 15 minutes than friends who had known him years," says Bernat, who has been probing podiatric appendages for five years after discovering the technique while studying reflexology, a homeopathic method in which practitioners apply pressure to spots on the foot that correlate to other parts of the body.

Bernat leaves no toe unturned, noting the bumps, curves, lengths and shapes that determine one's personality. She also reads between the toes, saying the gaps are as revealing as the digits themselves.

Toe reading isn't unique, but it is rare. Bernat says she learned the craft from Language of the Feet, a book not available in the United States (she ordered it on Amazon.com's Britain site).

Bernat estimates she has read about 500 sets of toes over the years, including at a party when she was hired to read the toes of teens celebrating their high school

"Pretty soon all the people around me had taken off their shoes wanting me to read their toes," Bernat said. "So I did."

She's aware of the many skeptics who believe pinched toes are not an indication of conformity (as Bernat indicates) but of too-tight shoes.

"But why wear shoes that are so uncomfortable unless you want to look good, conforming to society?" she says.

Good point.

The art of toe reading has nothing to do with being psychic or other "out-there beliefs that make you look like a kook," Bernat says. It has to do with body language, your toes being an indication of the way you conduct yourself and your life. It's scientific, she said, not intuitive.

Janice Lennertz was surprised at the accuracy of a recent 30-minute reading, having no idea her toes would correctly indicate her to be a success-oriented, independent woman with a tendency to become sidetracked.

Bernat, for one. Before she met her boyfriend, she would read the toes of prospective partners, often on the first date. Not one man, she says, declined to bare his toes.

But she has declined a date or two based on the tale of those toes. She has met men whose her all she needed to know.

"They were players," she says. "It hit me right away."

While Bernat is happy to read anyone's toes, including as part of a spa treatment at Copper reading of the left foot. Those are the spiritual toes.

"I don't want to talk religion or politics with my clients," she says. "It's not worth it."
